

An exemplary day in the life of a policewoman

One day at 6 p.m.
when I was at work, I got a notification. It was about a murder. I quickly got dressed
and went to the scene. The incident
took place in the forest.

A man who was on a walk made a tragic discovery. It was a very young woman. Dressed in black pants and a gray sweatshirt. She had long, straight brown hair. There was a lot of blood around the woman.

Together with the officers, we secured the scene. Then we moved on to the search for evidence. First, I got shoe prints. Then we took the cuticle from under the nail. We also took the hair of the most likely perpetrator. We also secured a telephone that was probably owned by the perpetrator.

After securing and collecting all the evidence at 8 p.m. I took them to the police station where they will later be taken for examination and analysis. This is an exemplary day in the life of a policewoman.
